As a result of the geographic position of the island Crete and the tempestuous history, the Cretans have always been subjected to a variety of influences, however the particular character of the islanders has not changed. They have a passion for independence and freedom and a deep love for their homeland, which has been strengthened by their struggles against the various invaders. Cretan people are very sociable and warm, hospitable and friendly to strangers, optimistic and open hearted people too. In their daily life they are impulsive and despite foreign influences and models, they retain their old customs and traditions, especially in the villages and small towns, of Crete, where even today one sees men in the characteristic local dress "Vraka" or long buggy trousers and high boots.
